Emkoshka says

The kids take a literal leap of faith and leave the school to discover a creepy old theme park where the animatronics (bless the Japanese) have gone feral. As if that isn't enough peril, cannibalism finally gets them.

quinnster says

When a dark cloud of poisonous smog begins to hover on the horizon the students realize they must put aside their fighting long enough to flee out of reach of the clouds.

There are tense moments when I wasn't sure if Yu, Sakiko & Sho would make it, especially when they got to the ravine. But the story feels like it's about to reach a conclusion of some sort.

Orrin Grey says

Things get even weirder as the students leave the school in search of "paradise." There's some great sequences near the end of this volume.

Charles Dee Mitchell says

I am afraid this series jumped the shark some volumes back. This time round it's more clouds of toxic gas, more fights to the death between 10 year olds, more of what's becoming mundane for our long-suffering heros. There is one shocker after they reach Paradise, which turns out to be an old amusement park, but even it I had been predicting since the first volume.

I thought Volume 10 finished the story, but no, there is more. One more volume that is going to have to be pretty spectacular to not to be an anti-climax.

Ahmed Jadaa says

Hilarious

Tony says

Everything gets even more ridiculous and horrible - which is a good thing.

Sue Moro says

In this volume, Sho and the other students must get past the mutant creatures in order to get out of the path of poisonous toxic clouds headed their way. Otomo and his group follow Sho, even though they have been enemies for some time now. A dying student told them to head toward Mt. Fuji where they would find "paradise", but once they arrive they find something almost too strange to comprehend! Will the mutant creatures get them, will they starve to death, or will they continue to kill each other before they find a way to get back home to their own time? Only one more volume in which to find out.
