Bharathi Baskar is a seasoned orator and she evolved over time to become a seasoned orator. Likewise, she will evolve in her writing as well. The short stories have been written well, the flow and the narration are good, however in some of them, it is very predictable in the way the story would flow or end which might not make it very interesting to read. The narration of the stories is very good like her speech.

Day today incidents with heart touching perspective

Usually i like her oration in debate's....same in her books too....very casual and natural prespective on every incidents....felt lightness in heart when read....

Sundarraj Kaushik says

A decent collection of short stories. Most of them may be termed as feminist, but not hardcore feminist. Most stories highlight the plight of womenfolk in India.

The main story "Appa Ennum Villain" is the one touches the heart the most. A cook wants his daughter to become a big person. He keeps pushing and prodding her and not appreciating any feat of hers. Finally when she succeeds and wins accolades for her success he finally concedes and attends the ceremony to honour her. It speaks of the sacrifice the father made for his daughter's growth and all the while the daughter though that he was a villain as she felt she was not appreciated by him. She finally understands him and acknowledges that everything he did was for her good.

A nice read.
