OMG GEN!!

Gen died!?!?!? I don't want to believe!!!!!! This volume seems one of the beginning of climaxes. The combination of Gen, Yoshimori and Tokine was so good, so I don't want to believe that Gen died. Gen grew after he met Yoshimori and Tokine. I think the person who changed the bad image to good image tends to be a victim.

Estara says

The threads in this volume get ever more tangled with Yoshimori's older brother word-fencing with this clear opponent on the Schattenorgan, with Gen reflecting on his position between normal people and yokai, and with the enemies internal problems and contests.

It seems as if Byaku, the top guy among the enemies is trying to keep their Landgod, a fox princess, alive by transferring her to Karasumori. It's not clear yet why he does so, as he manipulates everyone to his tastes and has chained the princess herself down in her castle.

We get some nice fighting with one of the stronger enemies, an old-time thunder and lightning god, on the school grounds, but the Kekkaishi and co. manage to repel the invasion. The real emotional hammer comes from Gen sacrificing all the warnings and orders of his superiors to fight for Yoshimori and Tokine to his utmost powers, almost winning and then being killed from behind.

And yes, this is a real death. He hasn't shown up again in all the volumes that have been released so far in Germany. Which is why Yoshimori is so done in by it, especially as he can almost see Karasumori's mysterious powers granting Gen's wish of dying. It's another time he hasn't been able to keep someone else from being hurt for his sake, and this time the person has died.

And then there's Masamori who sent Gen here and now has to live with the results. These stresses between the brothers are really a highlight of the series: there is lots of action, but also lots of emotional development and consequences.

Major character death :(

Not to give away too much, let me just say that this volume moves Kekkaishi out of typical shonen adventure into darker territory. The plot is continuing to evolve, and the danger that each of the characters is him or herself in is becoming increasing palpable. I have two complaints, though. First, the fire horse villain looked like something snatched out of a bad Hanna Barbara cartoon. Second, the volume ends with devastating sadness, making the closing pages of Yellow Tanabe penguin silliness seem in rather poor taste.

Yay for more Kekkaishi! It has been nearly two years since I read the 9th volume of Kekkaishi. Now I've moved (twice) and my library doesn't carry any copies of Kekkaishi nor can I find it at Barnes & Noble. So I was forced to...gasp...buy it.

Volume 10 feels more like Volume 1 for me since it's been so long since I've read the series. I often felt like I was forming opinions about these characters for the first time. Thankfully and surprisingly I remembered most of what had happened in the prior nine volumes. The short synopsis at the beginning of the volume helped too.

I continue to love Yoshimori. I like his fierceness, his talent, and his stubbornness. I like that he seems more like a boy still than a young man. It seems realistic for a kid his age (I think he's 12). Sometimes his "stubbornness" most closely resembles whining. In most contexts that would be irritating, but it brings Yoshimori to life.

The plot is pretty standard. Really important demons come to the site Yoshimori, Tokine, and Gen guard. The kids have to fight them. Added to the excitement is the fact that minor demons attack Yoshimori's house and his grandpa has to fend them off. I love his feisty grandpa who looks frail but can fight with the best still.

There was a big surprise at the end. I'm wondering if they'll reverse course in future volumes but maybe not. At any rate, I can't wait to read more.

Joy says

I'll forgive the wretched villain character designs for the way the events of this volume raise the stakes for the main characters.
