Hundreds of years from now, modern civilization has utterly collapsed and the Earth's population has been reduced to about what it was during the time of the ancient Greeks and Romans. Humanity is in the midst of building a new civilization based largely on technology leftover from our civilization, some of which has managed to survive into the future. The time travelers from the first two books of the Safety Factor trilogy try to make a home for themselves there, but are confronted by enormous changes in society, science and the human psyche. They are plunged into a world rife with the aftereffects of global warming, and where genetically engineered animals are bread as "workers". What will our refugees from the past do when they see humanity once again making the same mistakes that ended our civilization?

Maria says

The final book in the series, The Safety Factor Book III (Beyond Perfection) takes the reader to a future world where talking monkeys serve humans, and genetically engineered gorillas are being produced to do the work that the monkeys cannot do. We join the characters from Book II, who have escaped to this new world. This book reads much more like a science-fiction book than any of the others in the series. It contains a great deal of philosophical discussion, and scientific detail which will appeal to readers of science-fiction. It is an interesting tale, speculating on what the world will be like in the future in the aftermath of global warming and destruction by war. It is an exploration into whether it would ever be possible to build a civilisation that will last, given that human behaviour never changes. It is a book about betrayal, trust and hope, and also about love. The writers have used the future world as a setting, to put across their view of the world and the reason our society is so unstable. There is a twist at the end, in the epilogue. It appears to have been left open for a future book to be added to this complex and entertaining series.
