Fire Song Roberta Gellis

Third in the Royal Dynasty series.

Fenice d'Aix and Aubery of Ilmer both had unhappy first marriages. Both had guilty secrets related to those marriages, but each found in the other what had been lacking in their first union. Each longed for the passionate love offered by their new partners. Nonetheless, neither dared expose their hidden secrets lest they lose everything.

The hidden deceptions make Aubery's political duties more hazardous. Having failed twice in his attempts to kill Aubery, an old enemy decides to violate and then murder Fenice as his only fit revenge. Fenice's abduction makes truth a necessity between Fenice and Aubery. But it is not until he loses Fenice that Aubery's pride bends enough to allow him to declare his love . . . almost too late.

I'm so torn by this series. On the one hand, I do like the fact that the characters don't have anachronistic attitudes about class distinctions or women's rights but on the other hand that means that the "heroes" are basically total assholes. I think this one, Aubery of Ilmer was the worse so far, going so far as to tell his wife he should kill her for rescuing him when she had risked her own life to save him because I guess he thought she was unladylike. I would have let the ungrateful jerk rot in prison forever at that point instead of welcoming him back to her like doormat Fenice did. Bah!
