I started reading this book after a recommendation from my father. I was in 8th grade then. Suffice it to say that after reading it I was not sure what I understood. Or did I understood anything at all?

But as a practicing Muslim I felt an increase in my faith during and after reading this book. I had some spiritual experiences afterwards.

Later when I was in university I reread the book. I can't say that I understood it completely but I got to the crux of it.

This book is about "Fanaa"[(Arabic: ?????? fan??) is the Sufi term for "passing away" or "annihilation" (of the self).]

It discusses the stages from which a man passes through to reach the destination of "Baqaa billah" after "Fana fillah" . Throughout the book it is not possible to say weather the journey is voluntary or involuntary. The book seems out of order for one discussing a spiritual journey. There is no start or end. The endings of the path are discussed in one of the starting chapters and some of the details and finer points of the journey are discussed later in the book.
