Adrienne Thompson says

I thoroughly enjoyed this lovely collection of poetry composed with light, darkness, and hints of magic. Nice collection.

Travelling Light by Vickie Johnstone is one of my favorite poetry books I've read this year. The poem 'Dreamers' has the opening line "She lives among the dragons, stars and unicorns The fairytale world born in her wildest dreams." Could be my favorite line in this whole book. Vickie Johnstone knows how to play with words and brings joy to poetry. If you don't read much poetry, this book is a great place for you to start because of poems like Moon over Sand, Hope, Little boy leaps & so much more!

I enjoyed Miss Johnstone's book of poetry. What a beautiful collection. The poems are sweet and alluring. Each piece provokes different emotions. When poetry is good it kind of talks to you and that is what I loved about this book. I would recommend this to anyone who enjoys good poetry.

Even though the title is "Traveling Light" some of the work is not so light, which I really appreciated. There were so many different little gems to chose from and all had a special spark.

Two

In love with the beloved
Love will know no end

There is no end to love
If the beloved is the one

In love is the beloved
She is loved as he is loved

One to be forever more
Two in love entwined

Ingrid M. S. says

I really like poetry.

I mean, I write them myself and there was a lot of beautiful poems, so yes, it was worth my time.

Breslin White says

This is a difficult book to review because of its originality.

Perhaps, from the title of the book, it's best to point out that the author is clever. Travelling Light can be read one of two ways: either packing a little, or the light of the day that recedes. This is in fact referred to inside the book where the author is carrying two suitcases, and where day is said to be eaten by night.

The sound of the words used seems to be staccato.

While not the greatest poetry I've ever read in my life, it puts up a fight and gets the five stars.

The smell of sour

This stench lifted

...

This reminder of old

When it sounded

This ancient bell

The heady mariner

Came carrying his shroud

Bereft of any knowledge

Of its meaning

In silence he drifted

Into the outer realms

Where the dead pound

Ageless and unborn

Their endless ache ...

Jenny Housley says

A nice slim collections of poems. Beautiful, lonely, a pleasure to read

Really not a fan of this poetry book. Only a couple of the poems stood out, the rest were very uninspiring and fell flat for me. A lot of the poems seemed very lifeless and spiritless.

Uvi Poznansky says

Vickie Johnstone writes sensual, beautiful images, and this short collection includes many of her free-flowing explorations. "They are not about me, but filled with imaginary characters and places," she says. I appreciate the humble voice of the author, reflecting upon her work in her introductory note, "It isn't great poetry, but I try!" Clearly, her talent shows in every piece. When she dares reveal more of herself in her writing, her artistry will reach a peak.

Here are a few glimpses of her work. From the poem, We live in the echoes:

Where the Fool laughs his last
Is a time we'll never see
For he plays so beautifully
Daring to step beyond himself
Embracing all there is to see
With such wide open arms

Vickie Johnstone writes many of these poems in the third person narrative, expressed in the midst of a magical, fairytale world. Here is an excerpt from Dreamers:

She dreams the dreams she yearns to live
Ascending the high, jagged mountain reaches
Descending the bleakest, deepest chasms
She rides the unicorn, outpacing green forests

Even when she writes in a first person narrative, she remains the observer of her world, a visitor somewhat removed from events, contemplating upon what she sees:

Painted canvases I visit
Now I'm not chained
To any one place
Travelling free as a bird
I measure my life in two suitcases

And here is an excerpt from a great poem, Lost and found:

Give me back the thing you stole
Don't pretend that you've forgotten
When this was once the key to all
Nothing fades like trust broken

This is a fine collection by a promising young poetess, and I am looking forward to read more of her work.

Four stars.

Heartfelt and Beautiful

HOPE is my favorite. Thank you, Vickie Johnstone, for writing a short, yet meaningful book of beautiful poetry! Highly recommend this for anyone who appreciates passion put to paper.

To me, this collection was exactly what it said it was: a search for something new yet familiar in life's journey. The poems inspire other poets and I enjoyed reading it.

I liked this collection of poems.

Jillian says

I read this collection of poems and was drawn to her words. I loved the beautiful flowing words and the relaxing vibes I got from reading it. It's a decent read.

Jess says

Usually I'm a huge fan of poetry, but this really didn't click for me. The imagery was somewhat present, but the writing just seemed very juvenile and the word choice was very bland. I was hoping to enjoy this, but I was sadly mistaken.

It's April and that means it's National Poetry Month. Despite the fact that I don't read a lot of poetry nor can I usually decipher the meaning behind most of it I do know what I like when I read it. If it makes me smile, cry, or just strikes a chord somewhere within me I know I've read a piece of poetry that means something to me and ultimately I think that's what makes poetry enjoyable for anyone. Travelling Light by Vickie Johnstone is just such a book of poetry for me.

Originally I had chosen a different collection to highlight but then I ran across Travelling Light by Vickie Johnstone and downloaded it to my Kindle. From the very first piece I was captivated by the beauty of Vickie's words and I read this collection not once, but twice! What I like best about this author's work is that it is very straight forward. I didn't have to search for a hidden meaning because I knew what she was trying to say and I really appreciated that as a novice poetry reader. Some of these poems are on the light side and some much darker – some I really liked and others were just ok but again that reflects back on how a piece reacts with the emotions of the reader. I found it to be a very enjoyable collection and intend to read more of Vickie's work.

Finally, I thought I'd share one of the pieces that I enjoyed. I chose the poem November simply because it resonated with me. We've had such a bad winter this year and it's still not over and I long for spring and this poem perfectly captured that.

November

November chills me with its breath
It shocks me out of this limbo
With its icy fingers and numb breaks
Darkness comes creeping in earlier

Crisp steps it makes across the land
As the sky sinks down ever nearer
Trees reach skyward for past blossoms
Carried away on the back of the wind

I yearn to bury myself away in warmth
To hibernate like a sleeping hedgehog
In a small box of paper, hidden away
Nestled alone with my memories

Wake me in the warm glow of spring
As I'm sure I will not miss a thing
This slow slide into winter unnerves me
Season of change, death and seclusion

Bring me sunshine on a silver platter
With roses tinted pink in summer scent
The smell of green brought by the rain
Smile away the despair of the darkest day

Greta Burroughs says

I enjoy reading poetry that makes me think, and I like the way Vickie Johnstone captures thoughts, feelings and emotions in her work. Her poems are not ones the reader can just breeze through but you need to reread each one to grasp the true meaning hidden within the words. Try it, I think you'll like it.
