Calendar Novella #9

Better reign in hell than serve in heaven?

In a way, the protagonist discovers that innocent heaven is the same kind of hell as his familiar civilisation, only with a slightly different and more collaborative code of conduct. After he unsuccessfully tries to impose his way of living, and his power, on a group of blind people living in a remote mountain village, he has to make the decision whether he bows to their customs completely - by sacrificing what makes him different, his vision - or whether he prefers to move on and fight for his individual survival alone. Free falling.

A deeply pessimistic take on humanity, so convinced of their own absolute truth that they are not even interested in new perspectives. Changing society just means changing the mainstream requirements, not the dogmatic mindset as such. An early example of the ideas that Orwell would summarise as "nationalist". Whoever has the power, has the storytelling rights.

Great novella!
