The Mehlis Report is a thriller only for marketing purposes. Set in Beirut in 2004-2005, the novel is centered on the report drawn by the German prosecutor, Mehlis, on the assassination of the Lebanese Prime Minister Rafiq Hariri. While the description of Beirut is extremely vivid, and the reader can feel, on the one hand, the fear that permeates everyday life in a city ravaged by bombs, and on the other, the charm of a complex, multicultural society, the novel doesn't really come to life. There is something stagnant about it, in spite of its premise—the anxious expectation of the report—, and the idea of having dead people contact the world of the living via cell phones is rather embarrassing (notwithstanding the author's obvious symbolic intentions; besides, what are the dead supposed to symbolize here? I'm sure the author himself could only give a muddled answer.) This is a very uneven novel (for one thing, it probably has one of the worst beginnings in the history of literature, and I doubt that the editors of New Directions would have ever published it had it been written by an American writer), a novel with potential, but maybe the author, who already wrote fifteen novels before reaching forty, should have taken more than just a few months to write it.
