Samsa in Love Haruki Murakami , Ted Goossen (Translator) , Javier Jaén (Illustrator)

Samsa had no idea where he was, or what he should do. All he knew was that he was now a human whose name was Gregor Samsa. And how did he know that? Perhaps someone had whispered it in his ear while he lay sleeping? But who had he been before he became Gregor Samsa?

Call me a 'Murakami maniac' but I love the way this man writes and something in me died when he didn't he get the Nobel Prize, even though feminism did a Hula-Hoop for Alice Munro!

LEAVING all that aside, Samsa in Love was a story I nicked out of someone's FB profile, and read on a night Sleep couldn't find a way to seduce me stealthily! And it touched a chord at once. Though slightly long and highly descriptive, Samsa... is a story of a cockroach that wakes up one morning to find itself transformed into a human being named Gregor Samsa and among all the things it discovers/learns about humans, like how to walk on two feet, the importance of dressing up, the GINORMOUS appetite of humans, it also discovers something it couldn't have ever come across as an insect:love!

No, I don't agree that love is an emotion unique to humans alone! I have had dogs all my life, for God's sake. And yes, I think it's presumptuous to assume that we're the only animals to harbour that feeling. (Animal cognition might be more advanced than we give it credit for. We Palaeolithic archaeologists argue about that almost everyday!)

Despite that, there's something heart-warming about this story, something that makes you want to laugh as you might at the innocence of a baby and cry as you might at something that makes you realise how complicated, how distant we humans have become from things that come into us quite naturally and how we have stopped listening to our own hearts.

Yes, that is what Samsa in Love is all about, about innocence, about sincerity of emotions and pure, honest actions arising out of feelings and not need! Funny, how much a short story can say!

Samsa in Love, Haruki Murakami

Gregor Samsa wakes up in a bedroom of a two-story house, sure of who he is but unsure of his surroundings. He is hungry, so he slowly goes downstairs to the kitchen, getting accustomed to moving his body. Food is already prepared on the table, so he eats everything. He then notices that he is naked, so he searches the house until he finds a gown. When the doorbell rings, he opens it to find a young, hunchbacked female locksmith who says that she is here to fix a lock in the house. Hesitant, he tells her that one of the room's lock upstairs needs fixing. As they interact, Samsa notices that he is unable to understand some of the common words she uses. When she tells him that she needs to take the lock to her family of locksmiths for further work, he asks her why she rotates her arm so often. She says that her brassiere is uncomfortable on her; while telling him this she notices that he has a visible erection. Offended, she scorns him before he says that he has no idea what he is doing. Before she leaves, he asks her if she could return so that they could talk, as he is still confused about most of the world. She says perhaps they can do so when she returns the lock, before she walks back to her family through military-occupied Prague.
